Report of the Secretary-General on specialized anti-piracy courts in Somalia and other States in the region

I. Introduction

1. The present report is submitted pursuant to paragraph 16 of Security Council resolution 2015 (2011) of 24 October 2011, in which the Council decided to continue its consideration, as a matter of urgency, of the establishment of specialized anti-piracy courts in Somalia and other States in the region with substantial international participation and/or support. The Council requested that the Secretary-General, in conjunction with the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime (UNODC) and the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), further consult with Somalia and regional States willing to establish such anti-piracy courts on the kind of international assistance, including the provision of international personnel, that would be required to help make such courts operational; the procedural arrangements required for transfer of apprehended pirates and related evidence; the projected case capacity of such courts; and the projected timeline and costs for such courts, and to provide the Council with detailed implementation proposals for the establishment of such courts, as appropriate.¹

2. The prosecution of suspected pirates and imprisonment of those convicted are being addressed by the Somali authorities and other States in the region with the assistance of UNDP, UNODC and the United Nations Political Office for Somalia (UNPOS) in the context of their work to develop the capacity of national courts. The present report has been prepared on the basis of that experience and of further consultations by UNDP with the Somali authorities and by UNODC with the authorities in Kenya, Seychelles, Mauritius and the United Republic of Tanzania — the States in the region that are either prosecuting piracy cases with United Nations assistance or are engaged with UNODC to consider the possibility of doing so.² The Office of Legal Affairs has consulted the Permanent Missions of each of the Member States addressed in the present report, and the Chairman of Working Group 2 of the Contact Group on Piracy off the Coast of Somalia (the Contact Group).³ While every effort has been made to ensure the accuracy of the information set out in the report, it has not been possible to verify it independently in every instance. The State of Qatar has written to the Secretary-General to indicate its readiness to host an anti-piracy court and has requested that the United Nations follow up with a view to determining the next steps.

3. Section II of the present report updates the information given in previous reports concerning incidents of piracy off the coast of Somalia and prosecutions by States. The international assistance received and the further international assistance that would be required for specialized anti-piracy courts in Somalia, Seychelles, Kenya, Mauritius and the United Republic of Tanzania are set out in section III. In section III the proposal for the establishment of an extraterritorial Somali anti-piracy court is also briefly reviewed and the proposed establishment of a regional prosecution centre in the Seychelles is discussed. Possible detailed implementation proposals are set out in section IV, and section V contains conclusions. In each of the concerned jurisdictions, the courts conducting piracy prosecutions do so under national law within the framework of their existing court structure. The UNDP and UNODC consultations indicate that the national authorities would not favour establishing new special courts with jurisdiction exclusive to piracy offences, which they consider may constrain scarce prosecution and judicial resources to piracy cases in the absence of any certainty that they would be consistently and fully occupied. The term “specialized anti-piracy court”, as used in the present report, should therefore be understood to refer to a court operating under national law, with international assistance and with a focus on the prosecution of piracy offences.

4. In respect of each jurisdiction, the present report assesses the current capacity and international assistance received to date to conduct piracy cases and the further international assistance that would be required for a specialized anti-piracy court to conduct cases in accordance with international standards of fairness.⁴ For each jurisdiction, a projection is made of the caseload capacity that could be achieved, as well as timelines and costs. Although the request of the Security Council does not refer to international assistance for the imprisonment of suspected and convicted pirates, this has been included in the report because consultations have demonstrated that it is a key element in the capacity of States to receive transfers of suspects from patrolling naval States.⁵

5. In the consultations conducted by the Office of Legal Affairs, each of the Permanent Missions referred to above confirmed the commitment of their Government to combating piracy off the coast of Somalia. It was clear that those

States in the region that are conducting piracy prosecutions consider that they have taken on a heavy responsibility that entails a commitment of national resources as well as security risks. It is important both to acknowledge the important prosecution role that they are playing and to strive to ensure that their national commitment is matched by strong support and assistance from the international community. They emphasized the continuing need for contributions by States, international organizations and the shipping industry to the Trust Fund to Support Initiatives of States Countering Piracy off the Coast of Somalia. They also underlined that a sustainable response to piracy off the coast of Somalia requires the re-establishment of peace, security and the rule of law in Somalia and social and economic development for the Somali people.

6. The consultations reinforced the need for clarity in the present report concerning the projected capacities of specialized anti-piracy courts in States in the region. The projections made in section III and the detailed implementation proposals set out in section IV present the maximum caseload capacities that UNDP and UNODC consider could be achieved through the further international assistance set out in the present report. However, planning for the caseload capacities of specialized anti-piracy courts in States in the region should take account of the anticipated numbers of piracy suspects likely to be apprehended at sea and transferred to those States for prosecution. The three naval coalitions⁶ engaged in anti-piracy operations off the coast of Somalia have made only three requests to regional States for the transfer of piracy suspects during 2011, and only one incident was reported in which the suspects were released in circumstances where there may have been sufficient evidence to pursue prosecution.⁷ In 2011, Kenya received one request for the transfer of 24 piracy suspects, and Seychelles received two requests for the transfer of a total of 18 piracy suspects.⁸

7. In other words, of the total of 286 reported piracy attacks in 2011, only 4 resulted in any of the 3 naval coalitions considering that there would be sufficient evidence to warrant transfer of persons in their custody to a regional State for prosecution. It would therefore be prudent to make an assessment, with the assistance of the naval coalitions and other States active in naval operations, of the underlying reasons for the low number of requests for transfer of suspects to regional States and the likely anticipated demand for prosecution capacity in regional States for the foreseeable future. With the assistance of the various naval coalitions and States, such an assessment could help to determine the number of incidents in which piracy suspects were apprehended, the number in which the suspects were released and the reasons for each release. This may provide valuable information concerning the extent to which releases are caused, for example, by naval operational considerations or legal and evidentiary considerations. Such information may assist the Security Council and the Contact Group in their consideration of the most effective measures to combat piracy off the coast of Somalia.

⁸ At the time of issuance of the present report, there were four groups of suspects held on naval vessels at sea, by the United States of America, Denmark, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the European Union (Spain). The Secretary-General understands that the six suspects held by Spain may be transferred to Spain. It is unclear at this stage where the other groups of suspects may be transferred.

II. Incidents of piracy off the coast of Somalia and numbers of prosecutions by States⁹

8. Reports by the International Maritime Organization (IMO) indicate that during 2011, there were 286 attacks against ships in the waters off the coast of Somalia, of which 31 were successful. As of 20 December 2011, 13 ships were held by pirates, with a total of 265 hostages. This compares with 28 ships and 656 hostages held by pirates on 31 December 2010. The number of attacks per month declined throughout 2011, from a high of 45 in January 2011 to 14 in the month of November 2011. The success rate of attacks has also steadily declined from 21 per cent at the end of 2010 to 7 per cent in November 2011. The majority of attacks leading to vessels being hijacked during 2011 took place in the western Indian Ocean. The reduction in successful attacks was achieved through a combination of: (a) actions by naval forces; (b) the improved implementation of the IMO guidance and industry-developed best management practices for protection against Somalia-based piracy; and (c) the imprisonment of more than 1,000 suspects or convicted pirates and the fact that several hundred died or were lost at sea. The increase in privately contracted armed security personnel on ships may also have contributed to the reduction in successful attacks.

9. The presence of naval forces close to the coast of Somalia to contain and disrupt the activities of pirate groups has proved effective for the Gulf of Aden, but has led to a geographical expansion of pirate operations into the Red Sea, the Somali Basin and further off the coast of Somalia into the Indian Ocean. Pirates now operate in the high seas at distances of up to 1,750 nautical miles from the coast of Somalia, covering a geographical area of roughly 2.8 million square miles. Despite a reduction in the number of successful attacks, the total number of pirate attacks continues to be high. The geographic spread of pirate activities has put increased strain on scarce naval resources. The pirates have continued to deter action by the navies through the greater use of captured ships and dhows as “mother ships”, often retaining the captured crews on-board as human shields. Violence against seafarers continues to be reported and is a growing concern.

10. Since the issuance of the report of the Secretary-General of 15 June 2011 (S/2011/360), the number of States prosecuting acts of piracy off the coast of Somalia in their courts has remained at 20, and the total number of prosecutions taking place has increased from 1,011 to 1,063. The following table provides a breakdown of global piracy prosecutions from 2006 to the present.

III. International assistance for specialized anti-piracy courts in Somalia, Seychelles, Kenya, Mauritius and the United Republic of Tanzania¹⁰

11. The consideration of specialized anti-piracy courts in this section focuses on the legal framework in each of the above jurisdictions, the current capacity to conduct piracy prosecutions, the international assistance received to date and the further assistance that would be needed for a specialized anti-piracy court. Consideration is given to each of the main components of the criminal process — investigations, prosecution, the courts, legal aid and defence representation, and prisons. The scope for participation by international judges, advocates and other legal professionals is assessed. In the case of Somalia, this includes the possibility for participation by experts from the Somali diaspora.¹¹

A. Somalia¹²

Legal framework

12. Somalia's legal system consists of a formal legal sector, Sharia law and customary law, known as "Xeer". These three elements operate in parallel, and the distinction in their application is not always clear. The formal justice system, which reflects both civil and common law traditions, is not administered systematically, even where more formal governmental structures are in place in "Puntland" and "Somaliland". The Penal Code and the Criminal Procedure Code have largely not been updated since 1960, and are not available in the Somali language. UNDP and UNODC assessments indicate that the criminal and procedural codes in the three main regions of Somalia are out of date and contain numerous inconsistencies and deficiencies. They have assisted legal experts from the Transitional Federal Government, "Puntland" and "Somaliland" to form a Somalia Law Reform Programme Expert Group (the Law Reform Group), which has drafted and agreed upon anti-piracy legislation, prison and prisoner transfer legislation. UNPOS is encouraging the transitional federal institutions to pass appropriate counter-piracy legislation before the end of the transitional period, and the Somalia End of Transition Road Map (see S/2011/759, annex) tasks the Transitional Federal Government with enacting anti-piracy legislation by 18 May 2012.¹³

13. Against this background, and given the low numbers and level of training of legal professionals in each of the regions of Somalia (see S/2011/360, annex III, sect. A), increasing the capacity to conduct the prosecution of piracy cases is a major, long-term challenge. To investigate or conduct more complex prosecutions involving those suspected of financing, planning or organizing acts of piracy would be even more challenging. The capacity-building assistance in "Puntland" and "Somaliland" referred to in this section focuses on the prosecution of piracy rather than those more complex crimes. Training and mentoring by international experts is an integral part of the assistance being provided by UNDP, but there is currently no legislative basis for the participation of foreign nationals in proceedings in judicial or prosecutorial posts, and the authorities do not favour such participation. UNDP will actively explore the possibility of using experts drawn from the Somali diaspora as it moves forward with its plans for assistance. Details of the availability of legal professionals from the Somali diaspora were set out in the report of the Secretary-General of 15 June 2011 (S/2011/360, annex III, sect. B). The security situation in Somalia, including in "Somaliland" and "Puntland", is also a limitation on efforts to increase capacity, and in particular, on the possibilities for the deployment of international experts.

¹² UNDP assesses that the security situation in Somalia is such that it is not possible at this stage to provide assistance for specialized anti-piracy courts other than in "Puntland" and "Somaliland". Some limited judicial and prosecutorial training has been possible; UNDP has supported 27 legal aid centres throughout Somalia, working through bar associations, university law faculties and local non-governmental organizations (see S/2011/759).

“Puntland”

Legal framework

14. “Puntland’s” penal code and code of criminal procedure are those of Somalia, which do not expressly cover piracy offences. “Puntland” Piracy Law No. 6 of 18 December 2010 was passed by the “Puntland” parliament, based on legislation drafted by the Law Reform Group with the assistance of UNODC, but was amended in terms that are not consistent with the definition of piracy set out in the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea. The legislation, if amended appropriately and adopted, will make it an offence for anyone to finance, provide transport by air, land or sea, or provide weapons or any other equipment which facilitates the abduction of marine transport. The jurisdiction of “Puntland” over piracy offences would extend to acts committed anywhere on the high seas, and does not require a connection to “Puntland” (such as the nationality of the ship attacked, or the perpetrators or crew).

Current capacity, international assistance received and further assistance needed for a specialized anti-piracy court

15. “Puntland” courts have conducted some 30 cases involving about 290 piracy suspects. They have been heard in the assize courts in Boosaaso, Garoowe and Galkayo by a total of 18 judges. Approximately 240 of the suspects have been convicted. The challenges that the proceedings have faced include delays, lack of defence counsel, the lack of formal legal training of judges and other legal professionals, lack of secure and properly equipped courtrooms, and other infrastructure and resource issues. There have been concerns about bribery, and this is being tackled through a code of conduct, approved by the “Puntland” High Judicial Council, that will apply to the judiciary and the prosecution service.

16. The security situation in “Puntland” for prosecutors and judicial personnel is a major concern. Since the end of 2009, seven judges and prosecutors have been assassinated, and the Attorney General, the Deputy Chief Justice and a further prosecutor have escaped assassination attempts. Around 10 per cent of the prosecutors and judiciary in “Puntland” have been the subject of attacks. UNDP will develop options to address the problem, including enhancement of the “Puntland” police close protection capacity and provision of equipment to enhance security in courtrooms, such as metal detectors.

Investigations

17. There are approximately 150 officers assigned to investigations of the Criminal Investigation Division of the police force at key locations, including the main cities of Garoowe, Boosaaso, Qardho and Galkayo. They investigate serious criminal cases, including piracy, and present evidence in court. They face severe challenges, including a low level of basic investigation skills and the lack of established operational procedures, infrastructure, transport, and search or forensic equipment. Over the last 12 months, UNDP has trained 100 Criminal Investigation Division officers in investigations, operational procedures and basic forensic skills, and has provided police equipment. UNDP has improved police management capabilities and will provide police mentoring and advice through specialized Criminal Investigation Division experts, and international and national UNDP civilian police staff. UNDP is constructing a new police headquarters in Garoowe, rehabilitating a police station in Boosaaso and providing additional vehicles. It will also assist with the drafting of a police act, regulations and a code of conduct. UNDP plans are advanced to establish a national crime directorate in 2012, which will incorporate a counter-piracy unit with operational teams based in Boosaaso, Garoowe and Galkayo.

18. With further training of Criminal Investigation Division officers on investigative techniques, the rehabilitation of Division offices and the provision of forensic equipment, UNDP assesses that the “Puntland” police could have the capacity to investigate piracy crimes effectively within 20 months. UNDP will also conduct a maritime policing needs assessment in the first half of 2012.

Prosecution

19. There are 10 prosecutors in the “Puntland” Attorney General’s Office, 3 of whom have conducted piracy prosecutions. UNDP has provided basic training in substantive and procedural criminal law and a six-month programme through “Puntland” State University and the East African University to key prosecution staff and the judiciary. The prosecutors have received training by international Criminal Investigation Division prosecution experts. UNDP will train an additional 12 serving police officers to work as police prosecutors to support the prosecution service. It will also construct an Attorney-General’s Office in Garoowe, provide vehicles for the Attorney-General’s Offices in Garoowe and Boosaaso, help to establish a case management system and provide further training and mentoring by international experts, as well as equipment. UNDP estimates that, with this further assistance, the Attorney-General’s Office will achieve the capacity to prosecute piracy cases effectively within 20 months.

Courts, including legal aid and representation

20. Piracy trials in “Puntland” are heard in the assize courts, which are the courts of first instance and comprise a bench of three judges. Appeals go to the assize section of the appeals courts and can possibly go on to the Supreme Court. There are a total of 53 judges sitting in 17 assize courts, 4 appeal courts and the Supreme Court. Basic training has been provided in substantive and procedural law to 80 members of the judiciary, registrars and court support staff. UNDP has constructed and/or rehabilitated court premises in Garoowe, Qardho, Boosaaso and Galkayo, and established four mobile courts to travel to rural areas to hear cases. UNDP has also piloted a case management system in Garoowe, trained lawyers and staff in the Ministry of Justice, supported legal studies at the “Puntland” State University in Garoowe and provided copies of laws, as well as information technology equipment and vehicles. UNDP funds legal aid, including eight lawyers to provide free legal assistance and representation. All piracy suspects who do not have their own counsel are now provided with legal representation.

21. UNDP has received funds from the Trust Fund to Support Initiatives of States Countering Piracy off the Coast of Somalia to implement a three-year piracy trials programme to assist the authorities to conduct piracy trials in “Puntland” in accordance with international standards. It includes construction of a dedicated court to hear piracy cases, further amendment of the Piracy Law, the Penal Code and the Code of Criminal Procedure and their translation into Somali, capacity-development of the High Judicial Council, a package of training and mentoring for judges and support staff, and provision of courtroom equipment, including to enable evidence to be given by video link. There will be periodic monitoring by international experts to ensure that trials are in accordance with international standards. UNDP assesses that, with this further assistance, the “Puntland” courts could have capacity to try piracy cases in accordance with international standards within two years.

Prisons

22. UNDP and UNODC assess that current prison capacity is not sufficient and faces challenges, including overcrowding and a lack of basic medical facilities, water and sanitation, as well as a lack of opportunities for rehabilitative study and exercise. UNDP is building a new prison in Qardho, with an additional capacity of 266 inmates, which will be completed and handed to the “Puntland” authorities in April 2012 or thereabouts. UNODC has worked to expand prison space and to improve water and sanitation facilities at the prison in Boosaaso and is building a new prison, a prison headquarters and a training academy in Garoowe. The prison will have the capacity to hold 500 persons and will be made available to the “Puntland” authorities in 2013. It will be primarily for convicted pirates repatriated from other jurisdictions. It will be mentored and subject to independent monitoring to enable it to operate in accordance with international standards. Further, UNODC has assisted the Law Reform Group to draft a prison law to place the running of prisons on a sound footing and to provide a legal basis for the receipt of prisoners convicted of piracy in other jurisdictions. The Government of Norway has seconded two prison advisers for two years from November 2011 to assist UNODC with this work.

Projected capacity, timeline and costs of a specialized anti-piracy court

23. The assistance set out above would enable effective piracy investigations within 20 months, and within two years would result in trials in accordance with international standards in two courts with a capacity to hear 24 trials per year, with up to 10 defendants per case. The assistance in support of investigations would be provided for three years, and would cost a total of $1.1 million. Support to the courts would be for two years, with a further year thereafter of mentoring and monitoring. The total cost of that support over the three-year period, including 12 additional prosecutors would be $2.6 million. The Garoowe prison project will cost $9.8 million over 3 years, of which the first two ($8 million) are fully funded. The Qardho prison will cost a total of $1.5 million.

Transfers of suspects, evidence and prisoners

24. “Puntland” does not have any agreements with naval States or organizations to receive piracy suspects for trial in its courts. In practice, such agreements will not be entered into until naval States are satisfied that trials in “Puntland” are capable of meeting the human rights provisions that naval States and organizations include in such agreements. “Puntland” entered into a memorandum of understanding with Seychelles in April 2011, which follows the same framework as the agreement between the Transitional Federal Government of Somalia and Seychelles, for the transfer of convicted pirates for imprisonment in “Puntland”. The memorandum of understanding provides for transfers to be considered on a case-by-case basis; that is, it requires requests to be made by Seychelles in respect of each proposed transfer of a convicted person and consent by the “Puntland” authorities. The consent of the person proposed for transfer is also required. In the event of a transfer, “Puntland” is required to continue to enforce the sentence as if it had been imposed in “Puntland”. The transferred person must be treated in accordance with applicable international human rights obligations, and Seychelles has the right to monitor that those obligations are complied with. The necessary next steps include the adoption of the legislation necessary in “Puntland”¹⁴ to receive transferred prisoners and the completion of construction of appropriate prison facilities at Garoowe in 2013.

“Somaliland”

25. “Somaliland” also has a hybrid common and civil law system. Piracy offences are not explicitly covered in either the penal code or the code of criminal procedure. Article 486 of the Penal Code is usually applied to acts of piracy, which is the offence of “detention of a person for the purpose of robbery or extortion”. UNODC and UNDP have assisted the Law Reform Group to draft a specific piracy law, which is in the process of amendment and will soon be presented to the “Somaliland” parliament for approval.¹⁵ The “Somaliland” courts exercise jurisdiction exclusively in respect of offences for which there is a connection with “Somaliland”. This includes, for example, offences committed on the territory of “Somaliland” and offences where the perpetrators are from “Somaliland”.

Current capacity, international assistance received and further assistance needed for a specialized anti-piracy court

26. “Somaliland” courts have heard about 16 piracy trials involving around 97 suspects. The challenges that the proceedings have faced include delays, lack of defence counsel, the lack of formal legal training of judges and other legal professionals, lack of secure and properly equipped courtrooms, and other infrastructure and resource issues. There have been concerns about bribery, and this is being tackled through a code of conduct, approved by the “Somaliland” High Judicial Council, that will apply to the judiciary and the prosecution service. The courts and prosecution services in the coastal regions, mainly Erigavo and Berbera, have heard almost all of the piracy cases to date. UNDP assesses that the buildings, basic resources and infrastructure of the courts and prosecution offices in those areas are poor and that the proceedings face a number of challenges in meeting international standards of fairness. Although the security situation in “Somaliland” is less severe than in other areas of Somalia, security for prosecutors and judicial personnel involved in piracy cases is nevertheless a concern. Increasing the capacity of “Somaliland” prosecutors and courts to conduct piracy cases would increase the threat, and there would be a need to enhance protection for such personnel along similar lines to that required in “Puntland”.

¹⁴ The Chairman’s conclusions of the meeting of Working Group 2 of the Contact Group held on 11 and 12 October 2011 underlined the urgent need for Somalia to pass the necessary legislation, and supported the UNODC plan to revitalize the work of the Law Reform Group.

¹⁵ The “Somaliland” authorities have undertaken to have the law in place within six months. Revision of the penal code and the code of criminal procedure will also be needed.

Investigations

27. There are approximately 67 officers assigned as chief investigators in the Criminal Investigation Division at key locations around “Somaliland” who investigate serious crimes, including piracy, and present evidence in court. They face severe challenges, including a low level of basic investigation skills, and the lack of established operational procedures, infrastructure, transport, and search or forensic equipment. UNDP has provided specific counter-piracy training to 100 police officers, including on investigations, operational procedures and basic forensic skills. Further police mentorship and advice will be provided over the next 20 months through international and national UNDP civilian police staff.

28. UNDP is planning construction of a new police headquarters in Hargeysa, and model police stations in other regional centres. UNDP has provided assistance in the development of a police act, which is to be presented to parliament in the first quarter of 2012, and will be followed up with development of regulations and a code of conduct. UNDP is providing support to the Special Protection Unit in “Somaliland”, which provides protection to international agencies. Further Criminal Investigation Division training and mentoring will include investigative skills, and will aim to establish a specialized counter-piracy unit. Criminal Investigation Division offices will be rehabilitated and equipped. UNDP is assisting in the establishment of a national crime directorate and a criminal records management system. Specific support for capacity-building of the maritime police will also be provided. UNDP estimates that, with the above assistance, the “Somaliland” police will have the capacity to investigate piracy cases effectively within 20 months.

Prosecution

29. There are currently 36 prosecutors serving the whole of the “Somaliland” criminal court system. UNDP has provided a nine-month foundation programme through Hargeysa University to key prosecution staff, who have also received training by international Criminal Investigation Division experts. UNDP has constructed regional prosecution offices in Hargeysa and Burao, and will also do so in Boromo and Berbera. Assistance has been given to recruit 10 new prosecutors, including 5 female prosecutors. UNDP considers that, within 20 months, this increase in prosecutors should enable up to 24 piracy prosecutions per year to be conducted effectively.

Courts, including legal aid and representation

30. The “Somaliland” court system comprises 65 courts, including 52 district courts, 6 regional courts, 6 appeals courts and the Supreme Court. Piracy trials are heard at first instance in the assize sections of the district and regional courts by a bench of three judges. Appeals go to the assize section of the appeal courts and can possibly go on to the Supreme Court. There are a total of 120 judges sitting in these courts. UNDP has funded legal representation for all of the piracy suspects in the 16 trials, constructed district and regional courts in Hargeysa and offices for the High Judicial Council, and established five mobile courts to travel to rural areas.

31. UNDP has been given funds through the Trust Fund to Support Initiatives of States Countering Piracy off the Coast of Somalia to implement a three-year piracy trials programme to assist the “Somaliland” authorities to conduct piracy trials in accordance with international standards. This includes the amendment of key laws and their translation into Somali, development of the capacity of the High Judicial Council, further training and mentoring of judges and support staff, and provision of essential equipment, including to hear evidence by video link. UNDP assesses that this programme will make it possible to conduct piracy trials in accordance with international standards within two years, with continued mentoring and monitoring for a further year thereafter.

32. UNDP and UNODC assess that current prison capacity in “Somaliland” is not sufficient and faces challenges, including overcrowding, a lack of basic medical facilities, water and sanitation, and a lack of opportunities for rehabilitative study and exercise. Although UNDP and UNODC have recently completed construction of Hargeysa prison, it is fully occupied with domestic prisoners and has no capacity to receive those convicted of piracy in other jurisdictions. Now that “Somaliland” has confirmed its readiness to accept the transfer of Somali piracy prisoners into its prisons,¹⁶ UNODC is revisiting its draft proposal for additional prison capacity with an ongoing monitoring capability. The preference of the “Somaliland” authorities is for increased accommodation at existing prisons, rather than a new prison. This would consist of 200 places each at Mandera and Berbera prisons, and a block of 100 beds at Gabley prison (for juveniles). The proposed assistance includes training, mentoring and an independent monitoring regime. The two prison advisers seconded to UNODC by the Government of Norway will assist with this work.

33. The assistance described above would enable investigation and prosecution of piracy cases to be conducted effectively within 20 months and a maximum of 24 trials per year, with up to 10 defendants per trial, to be conducted in accordance with international standards in two years. Assistance to investigations would continue for a three-year period at a total cost of $1.05 million. Assistance to prosecution capacity would be provided for three years at a cost of approximately $2.6 million. Support to the courts would be for two years, with a further year thereafter of mentoring and monitoring, at a total cost of approximately $2.6 million. The additional prison accommodation of 500 spaces would take two years to complete, and would be likely to cost in the region of $6 million in total.

34. “Somaliland” does not have any agreements with naval States or organizations to receive piracy suspects for trial in its courts. In practice, such agreements will not be entered into until naval States are satisfied that trials in “Somaliland” are capable of meeting the human rights provisions that naval States and organizations include in such agreements. As “Somaliland’s” jurisdiction is limited to cases that have a connection with “Somaliland”, any future agreements with naval States for the transfer of suspects may be similarly limited.

35. “Somaliland” entered into a memorandum of understanding with Seychelles in April 2011, which follows the same framework as the agreement between the Transitional Federal Government of Somalia and Seychelles for the transfer of convicted pirates for imprisonment in “Somaliland”. The memorandum of understanding provides for transfers to be considered on a case-by-case basis; that is, it requires requests to be made by Seychelles in respect of each proposed transfer of a convicted person and consent by the “Somaliland” authorities. The consent of the person to be transferred is also required. In the event of a transfer, “Somaliland” is required to continue to enforce the sentence as if it had been imposed in “Somaliland”. The transferred person must be treated in accordance with applicable international human rights obligations, and the Seychelles has the right to monitor that those obligations are complied with.

36. In his report of 9 December 2011 (S/2011/759, para. 46) the Secretary-General reported that the counter-piracy work carried out in “Somaliland” by UNODC would come to an end early in 2012 following a decision of “Somaliland” to withdraw from the memorandum of understanding with Seychelles and the unexplained release of a large number of pirates from Hargeysa prison. UNODC is reconsidering that position in light of a statement issued by the “Somaliland” authorities on 11 December 2011 reconfirming their commitment to accept transfers of prisoners under the memorandum. The necessary next steps include the adoption of the legislation necessary in “Somaliland” to receive transferred prisoners and completion of construction of appropriate additional prison spaces over the next two years.

Brief review of the proposal for an extraterritorial Somali anti-piracy court

37. In his report, Jack Lang, Special Adviser to the Secretary-General on Legal Issues Related to Piracy off the Coast of Somalia, proposed the establishment of an extraterritorial Somali anti-piracy court in a third State in the region to act as a focal point for regional and international support to help strengthen the rule of law in Somalia, as a swift and inexpensive measure if located within the premises of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda in Arusha, United Republic of Tanzania (see S/2011/30, annex). In his report of 15 June 2011 (S/2011/360), the Secretary-General identified the modalities for the establishment and effective functioning of such a court, which included: consideration of the views of the Somali authorities and of potential host States; the need for an appropriate criminal and procedural legislative framework for piracy prosecutions; the need for trained judges, prosecutors and other legal professionals; and the need for security and premises.

38. Consultations conducted both by the Office of Legal Affairs and by UNDP have indicated that the Somali authorities continue not to favour the establishment of a Somali court outside the territory of Somalia, preferring any assistance for new courts to be implemented within Somalia. Further, the challenges faced by Somalia in relation to the adequacy of the legislative basis for piracy prosecutions, and the level of training and qualifications of Somali judges and other legal professionals, remain difficulties.¹⁷ Security experts continue to advise that co-locating an extraterritorial Somali anti-piracy court with the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda in Arusha, as proposed by the Special Adviser, would increase dramatically the risks to the Tribunal and its staff. The advice of the Department of Safety and Security remains that stand-alone premises would need to be found. It remains difficult to comment authoritatively on the Special Adviser's estimated annual costs for an extraterritorial Somali court (S/2011/360, para. 91). The need for stand-alone premises, associated security costs, and the salaries and other expenses of international experts, including from the Somali diaspora, may impact on those estimates.

B. Seychelles

39. In view of the continuing challenges facing the establishment of an extraterritorial Somali anti-piracy court at this stage, Working Group 2 of the Contact Group on Piracy off the Coast of Somalia has discussed the possibility of developing a regional prosecution centre, for example in the Seychelles. Consistent with the principles identified by the Special Adviser, the purpose of the centre would be to act as a focal point for regional and international support to the prosecution of piracy suspects and provide a location offering relative logistical ease for their transfer by naval forces. As the regional prosecution centre would be based in the national legal system of the Seychelles, it would enjoy the cost and speed of establishment advantages identified as important considerations by the Special Adviser.

40. The Government of Seychelles has indicated its willingness to host such a regional prosecution centre, contingent upon there being an effective post-trial transfer framework in place for the return of those convicted to Somalia. During 2012, Seychelles will open the Regional Anti-Piracy Prosecution and Intelligence Coordination Centre, under the auspices of the Indian Ocean Commission. The Centre will seek to develop the expertise to track piracy finances and develop cases capable of prosecution in Seychelles or elsewhere. The design of the facility is complete, and construction, supported by the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, is expected to begin in the first quarter of 2012. A number of States and international agencies have indicated that they may commit resources and staff to the Centre.

41. Seychelles has a common law legal system. Section 65 of the Penal Code, as revised with assistance from UNODC in March 2010, covers the offence of piracy and reflects the definition and jurisdiction over piracy offences set out in articles 101 to 107 of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea, read in conjunction with article 58(2).¹⁸ The revised provision has been the basis of the offence charged in six of the seven cases that have led to convictions in Seychelles to date. It allows prosecution for the full range of offences, including attempt, incitement and conspiracy. The law thus allows, in the assessment of the Attorney General of Seychelles, for the investigation and prosecution of foreign nationals involved in the financing, planning or organizing of piracy. Such prosecutions would be dependent on extradition of the suspects to Seychelles.¹⁹ The provisions of the Seychelles Criminal Procedure Code have proved suitable to support piracy prosecutions, and do not need amendment.

¹⁷ Although these may be alleviated to some extent through the recruitment of experts from the Somali diaspora to mentor and advise.

Current capacity, international assistance received and further international assistance needed for a specialized anti-piracy court

42. The Supreme Court of Seychelles is the highest trial court in Seychelles and the court of first instance for serious criminal cases, including piracy trials. Appeals would be heard by the Seychelles Court of Appeal, but there have been no appeals against piracy convictions to date. Seychelles has prosecuted eight piracy cases over the last two years. One case was withdrawn for lack of evidence, and the suspects were repatriated to Somalia, while seven cases resulted in convictions. The main challenge for Seychelles is the small size and resources of its judiciary, rather than any difficulty in conducting trials in accordance with international standards.

Investigations

43. Investigations of acts of piracy are carried out by the Seychelles police force and the Seychelles coastguard. There are a total of 35 investigators for the whole country, of which 5 have been selected to deal with serious crimes, including piracy. The police have received training and mentoring by UNODC and the International Criminal Police Organization (INTERPOL), and the coastguard has received training from UNODC and the European Union Naval Force Somalia (EU NAVFOR). UNODC maintains a full-time police training coordinator and a Central Investigation Division mentor in Seychelles who are assisting the police to improve management and to develop investigation skills, statement taking, operational procedures, forensic skills, case management and trial support. UNODC uses police officers loaned by the Governments of Australia and the Netherlands to provide specialist training, and the Mauritius police have seconded an investigator to provide further capacity. A further 12 investigators trained by the Criminal Investigation Division are needed to increase capacity, and additional international support is required to provide logistical assistance to the police, in particular to increase forensic capacity.

Prosecution

44. The Seychelles Attorney General's Office has six Seychellois prosecutors, one of whom (the Attorney General himself) has prosecuted one of the eight piracy cases to date, and two prosecutors seconded by the United Kingdom who have prosecuted the remaining seven cases.²⁰ UNODC has provided training in the law of the sea, guidance on the handover of suspects and evidence, funding to support the two United Kingdom prosecutors, legal and information technology resources and office equipment, and support for travel and training of prosecutors. UNODC will continue to provide this support. No additional international assistance is required if the ¹⁹ Rather than transfer from a naval vessel under the agreement with the European Union.

²⁰ The United Kingdom prosecutors prosecute other serious crimes when there are no piracy trials.

United Kingdom, or another Commonwealth country, continues to provide two prosecutors.

Courts, legal aid and representation

45. There are six Supreme Court judges, including the Chief Justice, none of whom are assigned exclusively to piracy trials. There is a backlog of approximately two years of both criminal and civil cases before the Supreme Court, but the judiciary has given priority to processing piracy cases. The seven piracy cases tried to date have taken an average of seven months from the time of arrest to judgment. All piracy suspects are afforded legal representation by Seychelles Legal Aid, which is refunded to the Government by UNODC using, in part, funds from the Trust Fund to Support Initiatives of States Countering Piracy off the Coast of Somalia. UNODC has reviewed piracy legislation and will continue to provide judicial training, legal resources and office equipment, transcription services, travel for foreign witnesses to testify in piracy trials, defence costs and court interpreters.

46. Subject to the approval of funding from the Trust Fund, UNODC will construct a courtroom dedicated primarily to piracy cases. While the Government supports the need for a new courtroom for this purpose, it is not favourable to the establishment under the law of a new court with jurisdiction limited exclusively to piracy. The Government has determined that no advantage would be gained by constraining court space and court staff exclusively to piracy trials, and that it would be wasteful during any lulls in the number of piracy suspects arrested or transferred to Seychelles. Seychelles has received only two requests for the transfer of piracy suspects in the last year.

47. Given the small size and limited resources of the Seychelles judiciary, UNODC assesses that additional Supreme Court judges would be required for a specialized anti-piracy court, and they would need to be recruited internationally. Seychellois law and practice allows judges and lawyers from other Commonwealth jurisdictions to practice in Seychelles.²¹ The Commonwealth Secretariat is therefore a natural interlocutor for this purpose, and has been approached by the Government with a view to initiating a recruitment process. The Government would be favourable to the assignment of Commonwealth judges primarily, but not exclusively, to piracy cases.

48. Seychelles has one prison, with a maximum capacity of 420. It is full and currently holds 63 convicted pirates and 7 persons suspected of piracy. UNODC assesses that conditions in the main prison block suffer from a lack of therapeutic, rehabilitative and vocational opportunities, and that the building does not provide a fully safe and secure environment. Refurbishment is under way, funded in part by UNODC. The Secure Incarceration Unit, constructed by UNODC, provides an additional 60 prisoner spaces.

49. UNODC assesses that Seychelles has very limited capacity to accept any further piracy prisoners until prison renovation work is complete in late 2012. Further, the Government of Seychelles considers it a precondition for an increased role in piracy prosecutions that there be a functional repatriation option for convicted pirates to be transferred to Somalia. If the prisoner transfer arrangements with “Puntland” and “Somaliland” become effective in practice, and when the prison building work in Somalia is complete, Seychelles would have physical capacity to hold more suspected and convicted pirates.

Potential capacity, timeline and costs of a specialized anti-piracy court

50. UNODC estimates that the two internationally recruited prosecutors and two additional Supreme Court judges could increase the number of cases heard per year to a maximum of 24. The addition of an extra courtroom for the Supreme Court, increasing the number of courtrooms to three, would raise the capacity to hold trials to a maximum of 48 cases per year. However, in practice, this maximum number would be limited by the availability of prison spaces to hold suspects on remand. UNODC estimates that, subject to prisoner transfer arrangements with Somalia becoming effective, the Seychelles prison could hold up to 100 piracy suspects at a time. This would allow approximately 15 to 20 cases per year, assuming an average seven-month stay in prison for each suspect.

51. UNODC estimates that, subject to funding availability, the additional assistance for all four areas set out above could be provided within 12 months. This would include the construction of a new secure courtroom for the Supreme Court,²² and recruitment of the necessary additional judges and administrative staff. The cost of increasing the capacity to conduct investigations consists of a $120,000 one-off cost for a secure exhibit room and $500,000 in annual costs. The $500,000 in annual costs breaks down as follows: $150,000 for training; $80,000 for forensic support; $50,000 for information technology equipment; $20,000 consumable stores, such as evidence-handling equipment; $140,000 for the training coordinator mentor; and $60,000 for logistics. Approximately 30 per cent of the annual costs for 2012 are already funded by UNODC.

52. The most feasible options for the funding of two additional Supreme Court judges would be either: (a) recruitment from Commonwealth countries where candidates would find the Seychelles salary attractive, in which case the $3,800 per month costs of each post would be reimbursed to the Government by UNODC; or (b) recruitment from Commonwealth countries where candidates would not find the Seychelles salary attractive, in which case, the most workable solution would be provision gratis by the sending Government.

53. The cost of defence lawyers would amount to approximately $7,700 per case, which would be provided by UNODC through the legal aid fund of Seychelles. Two locally recruited court administration staff would cost $12,000 per annum each. Transcription costs for 24 trials would be $80,000. Interpretation costs for 24 trials would be, at most, $200,000, allowing for 2 trials running simultaneously, each with two interpreters. Witness travel costs for 24 trials would be $120,000.

54. The building work and other improvements at the Seychelles prison would take 12 months, and costs are estimated at $500,000, of which UNODC has already received half. The annual costs of providing transport to and from court, additional medical resources for prisoners, and therapeutic, rehabilitative and vocational opportunities at the prison, would be in the region of $250,000.

²² Depending on an outstanding decision to be taken by the Board of the Trust Fund.

Transfers of suspects, evidence and those convicted

55. The Government of Seychelles has entered into arrangements with the European Union, the United States, the United Kingdom and Denmark to accept suspected pirates for prosecution. There have been eight piracy cases to date. Twenty-nine suspected pirates, in three of the cases, were transferred to Seychelles by naval States. The remaining 41 suspects were arrested by Seychelles authorities. In practice, the handover of suspects from warships to the Seychelles authorities has been straightforward. The terms of these arrangements vary a little, but generally concern the respective rights and responsibilities of the naval State and Seychelles, the treatment, prosecution and trial of the suspect in accordance with international human rights standards, and a requirement that the naval State give its consent before the suspect is transferred either for trial or imprisonment in a third State.

56. UNODC has assisted Seychelles authorities to draft guidance on the procedural and evidential requirements for piracy prosecutions. That guidance is the basis upon which naval forces transfer evidence to the Seychelles police force. The transfer arrangements are straightforward, and consist of a single policeman being assigned to receive the transfer of evidence, which is carried out manually. Initial problems associated with the gathering of evidence by naval forces and its transfer to the regional prosecuting States, in particular Kenya and Seychelles, have been overcome through the use of the guidance.²³

57. The Government of Seychelles has entered into an agreement with the Transitional Federal Government, and memorandums of understanding with the authorities of "Puntland" and "Somaliland", for the transfer of convicted persons to prisons in "Puntland" and "Somaliland". As set out in the section above concerning Somalia, each proposed transfer under these arrangements requires a request to be made by the Seychelles authorities and the agreement of the relevant Somali authorities. Concerns have been raised²⁴ about the lack of any such transfers to date, and the release of a large number of piracy prisoners in "Somaliland". In a recent statement, the "Somaliland" authorities reconfirmed their commitment to receiving transfers of convicted pirates under the memorandum of understanding with Seychelles (see para. 36 above). To become effective, these arrangements also require the completion of construction of suitable prison spaces in "Puntland" and "Somaliland".

C. Kenya

58. Kenya has a common law legal system. Section 371 of the Merchant Shipping Act 2009, read in conjunction with section 369, covers the offence of piracy and armed robbery, and was drafted with assistance from UNODC. It reflects the definition and jurisdiction over piracy offences set out in article 101 of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea, read in conjunction with article 58(2), and incorporates offences such as hijacking, as contained in the Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts against the Safety of Maritime Navigation. This legislation is the basis for charges in five cases currently before the Kenyan courts. It includes the offences of inciting or intentionally facilitating an act of piracy. It does not prevent an individual from being charged with attempting or conspiring to commit, aiding or abetting, counselling or procuring an act of piracy. UNODC, in cooperation with the Director of Public Prosecutions of Kenya, has proposed amendments to the Merchant Shipping Act which would expand the law to include those offences. The proposed amendments are currently under consideration by the Kenyan authorities.

59. The Merchant Shipping Act 2009 repealed the piracy provisions under section 69 of the Penal Code 1963. The repealed provisions are the basis for charges in five older piracy cases that are ongoing before the Kenyan courts. A High Court decision in November 2010 held that Kenyan courts do not have jurisdiction to hear piracy offences under that section, and all five older cases are therefore awaiting appeal.

60. Kenya's jurisdiction over piracy offences extends to acts committed anywhere on the high seas, and does not require a connection to Kenya, such as the nationality of the ship attacked, the perpetrators or the crew. The provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code of Kenya have proved adequate to support piracy trials and have not needed amendment. Naval forces transferring suspects to Kenya have for some time requested provision to allow naval witnesses to give their evidence by video link. A recent decision by the Magistrates Court suggests that civilian witnesses can give evidence by video link in cases where they are afraid to appear in person. This procedure will be followed for the first time in January 2012, with UNODC equipment linking a witness in Iran to the court in Mombasa.

Current capacity, assistance received and further assistance necessary for a specialized anti-piracy court

61. Kenya has been requested and agreed to accept one transfer case involving 24 suspects in the last 12 months. Seven piracy cases have been prosecuted over three years, resulting in one acquittal (of 17 suspects) and six convictions (of a total of 50 pirates). Another 10 cases (involving 93 suspects) are being prosecuted.

Investigations

62. Investigations by the Kenya police are carried out by the Criminal Investigation Division in Mombasa, and, although there is no designated counter-piracy team, the investigations are in practice carried out by the same two or three officers each time. While there are some investigative skill challenges, no piracy case thus far has failed owing to the quality of police work. Extensive support, training and mentoring has been provided by EU NAVFOR, UNODC, INTERPOL and bilateral donors, including Germany, the United States and the United Kingdom. UNODC assistance to the police has included training, mentoring and construction, including of a secure evidence room. Mentoring has focused on investigation skills, file preparation and review of piracy files for use in court.

63. The Mombasa Criminal Investigation Division would welcome the placement of a permanent international police adviser in Mombasa, and UNODC has identified a candidate who could be in post by 1 March 2012. The Division's offices in Mombasa need refurbishment to provide a modern, well-equipped environment for effective investigations. Further investigations training is required in interviewing, statement taking and investigative technologies. The armoury in Mombasa is in a state of disrepair, and requires rebuilding to hold weapons sufficient for security for an increased number of cases.

Prosecution

64. The Director of Public Prosecutions of Kenya has prosecuted seven piracy cases over three years. Seven prosecutors out of a total of 70 are assigned to piracy cases, but they also carry out other prosecutions. UNODC has provided training in law of the sea and naval operations, equipped the offices of the Director of Public Prosecutions in Nairobi and Mombasa, provided an office car and funded travel for prosecutors to attend court and meetings of Working Group 2 of the Contact Group.

65. UNODC will be providing further training, and will be meeting travel costs and equipping the Mombasa prosecution office. Additional prosecutors will be required in Mombasa in order to increase the number of piracy cases that can be prosecuted. They could be recruited either nationally or internationally. Although consideration could be given to assigning additional prosecutors exclusively to piracy cases, this would raise questions in a jurisdiction where there are some challenges regarding delays in the hearing of criminal trials.²⁵ While the law in Kenya²⁶ allows the Chief Justice to admit as advocates legal practitioners that are entitled to appear before the superior courts of Commonwealth countries, the law also requires such advocates to appear with a Kenyan advocate, and they are prohibited from signing or filing pleadings in court. There is a practice of foreign advocates appearing in the Kenyan courts, but consultations suggest that this may be permitted only if a specific need for foreign advocates is demonstrated.

Courts, legal aid and representation

66. The Magistrates Court in Mombasa is the court of first instance for piracy cases. Appeals are heard by the High Court in Mombasa, and they can go on to the Court of Appeal in Nairobi. Ten magistrates are assigned to hear piracy trials, but not exclusively piracy trials. UNODC has constructed a secure courtroom adjacent to Shimo La Tewa prison, 12 km north of Mombasa, where most of the suspected pirates are held on remand.

67. Kenya has prioritized piracy cases in the trial schedules before its courts, and there are 10 cases currently ongoing. The seven completed piracy cases have taken an average of 17 months from arrest to judgement. All piracy suspects are afforded legal representation on request through a Kenyan non-governmental organization, funded by UNODC. UNODC assesses that trials are conducted in accordance with international standards.²⁷ UNODC further assesses that there is unlikely to be support for the creation of new courts with jurisdiction exclusive to piracy, as it is not apparent that there would be an advantage to be gained by constraining court space and staff to piracy trials at times when there may be insufficient trials to fully occupy them.

68. If there were to be an increase in the number of piracy cases, additional magistrates would be required in Mombasa to avoid causing further delays in non-piracy cases. They could be recruited either nationally or internationally. Kenyan law allows for the recruitment of magistrates and high court judges from other Commonwealth or common law jurisdictions. There is a practice of such foreign judges sitting in Kenyan courts, but consultations suggest that a specific necessity for this in relation to piracy trials would need to be shown. An extra piracy caseload would also necessitate additional court administration staff, interpretation and court security and would involve costs for travel of foreign witnesses to testify.

²⁵ Kenya has undertaken judicial and prosecutorial reforms aimed at reducing delays.

²⁶ Section 11 of the Advocates Act.

²⁷ The Chief Justice of Kenya acknowledges that there are challenges regarding delays in trials.

69. Somali suspects awaiting trial in Kenya are held at Shimo La Tewa prison, which holds approximately 100 piracy suspects. Kenyan prisons have around 50,000 prisoners incarcerated (43 per cent of them on remand) and capacity for around 22,000. Shimo La Tewa is itself 300 per cent over capacity. Any additional Somali piracy suspects would therefore exacerbate the situation. Solutions might include the construction of additional cells, or considering possible means to reduce the existing prison population, while ensuring that piracy suspects are not given special treatment, which would be inconsistent with the Government's efforts to transform the judicial, prosecution and prison system under the new Constitution.

70. Of the 93 prison establishments in Kenya, support has been provided, or is currently being provided, to 6 prisons that have been designated to accommodate Somali pirates and suspects, including Shimo La Tewa. UNODC has improved water storage, sanitation and food preparation facilities, and provided staff training and medical, recreational, educational and other equipment. An additional piracy caseload may require only a modest number of additional prison cells, or the need for prison space may be met through a reduction in the existing prison population, subject to the important caveat referred to above.

71. If the number of officers handling piracy investigations were increased to five, and assistance provided as set out above, it is estimated that Kenya police could investigate up to 24 piracy cases per year. Provision of an additional eight prosecutors, with paralegal support, would be needed to prosecute that number of cases per year. An additional two magistrates could handle a maximum of 12 cases in 12 months each, or 24 cases per year. If sufficient magistrates and court staff were available, the single courtroom built by UNODC adjacent to Shimo La Tewa prison would be capable of handling a maximum of 12 cases per year. The remaining 12 additional cases would therefore need to be heard in the main courtroom in Mombasa.

72. It is estimated that up to 200 prison spaces could be made available every six months if it were possible to reduce remand and convicted prisoner populations as referred to above. This would likely be sufficient to enable the additional 24 trials to take place. Kenya does not have a prisoner transfer agreement with Somalia, and, if that remains the case, the capacity to achieve a maximum of 24 cases per year would be dependent on making national prison places available.

73. Increasing the capacity of investigations, as set out above, would take about 12 months. Construction costs would be: the new armoury ($160,000) and a purpose built Criminal Investigation Division office (which is likely to cost $400,000). UNODC currently has no funding for these activities. Annual costs would consist of mentoring ($160,000) and training of investigators ($100,000). UNODC currently has funding for approximately 25 per cent of these activities. INTERPOL also has some funding to assist.

74. With financing in place, and subject to the agreement of the Kenyan authorities, it would take a minimum of six months to recruit the additional domestic or international prosecutors and make them operational. Paralegals could be recruited in around three months. Eight national prosecutors paid $500 per month would each cost $48,000 per annum (including training). Internationally recruited prosecutors/advisers would be likely to cost around $160,000 each per annum (including travel and training). Four local paralegals would be sufficient, paid at $250 per month, resulting in a total annual cost of $12,000. Annual training and logistical support would be in the region of $150,000.

75. With adequate funding and the agreement of the Kenyan authorities, it would take approximately one year to recruit the necessary additional magistrates and court administration staff. The most workable options for the funding of magistrates would be: (a) recruitment nationally or from Commonwealth or common law countries where candidates would find the Kenyan salary attractive, in which event, UNODC would reimburse the $1,400 per month for each magistrate to the Government; or (b) recruitment from Commonwealth or common law countries where candidates may not find the Kenyan salary attractive, in which case, the most workable solution would be for the judges to be provided gratis by their home country.

76. Increasing the provision of UNODC funding to a Kenyan legal aid non-governmental organization for defence representation would cost $5,000 per case, totalling $120,000 per annum. Logistical support, including interpretation, witness travel to court and training averages $20,000 per case, totalling, at the most, $480,000 per annum.

77. Routine training and logistical support to the prisons is in place. The recruitment of staff to assist in reducing the prison population would take six months. There would be a one-off cost of the construction of a fully equipped 15-bed crisis care unit at Shimo La Tewa of approximately $250,000. Annual costs would be: logistical, medical and training support to the six Kenyan prisons (around $500,000); staffing and operating costs for the crisis care unit ($40,000); and the possible programmes to help reduce remand and convicted prisoner populations (around $200,000).

78. In 2009, the Government of Kenya signed agreements with the European Union, the United States, the United Kingdom, Canada, China and Denmark, to accept suspected pirates for prosecution. The Government of Kenya withdrew from those agreements in March 2010, but continues to accept piracy suspects for prosecution on a case-by-case basis and to apply the provisions of the former agreements for such transfers. Forty-four suspects have been accepted on that basis. The agreements vary a little, but they generally contain provisions concerning the respective rights and responsibilities of the naval State and Kenya, the treatment, prosecution and trial of the suspect in accordance with international human rights standards, a prohibition of the application of the death penalty, and a requirement that the naval State give its consent before the suspect is transferred either for trial or imprisonment in a third State.

79. Handovers of suspects from warships to the Kenya police, supported by UNODC police advisers and the EU NAVFOR liaison officer in Mombasa, have been straightforward and have not given rise to legal difficulties. Kenya has accepted the one case it was requested to receive in the last 12 months, but UNODC considers that renewal of the various agreements may increase certainty for the naval States of being able to transfer suspects.

80. To assist naval States in gathering evidence for transfer to Kenya, UNODC, EU NAVFOR and the Combined Maritime Forces worked with the Kenyan authorities to draft guidelines on their procedural and evidential requirements. The guidance note was published in July 2009, and has been successfully used by naval States. Transfers of evidence have proved straightforward and have not led to difficulties before the Kenyan courts. The Secretary-General understands that Kenya has not to date approached the Somali authorities with a view to negotiating prisoner transfer agreements.

D. Mauritius

81. During consultations, the Government emphasized that it had adopted a set of measures to effectively combat the spread of piracy in the Indian Ocean.²⁸ Mauritius criminal law derives from both common and civil law systems. On 13 December 2011, the Mauritius parliament adopted the Piracy and Maritime Violence Act, which is expected to come into force in January 2012. It reflects the definition of and jurisdiction over piracy, as set out in articles 101 and 105 of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea, read in conjunction with article 58(2). Section 3 of the Act defines piracy and the offences of inciting or intentionally facilitating acts of piracy. These provisions could potentially allow for the investigation and prosecution of foreign nationals involved in organizing or financing piracy. Such prosecutions would be dependent on the home State extraditing the suspects to Mauritius.²⁹ The Act specifically provides for the transfer of suspects by the European Union or States for prosecution, for the possibility of witnesses statements to be admitted in evidence in the absence of the witness and for the transfer of convicted persons. UNODC considers that the rules of procedure and evidence set out in the Criminal Procedure Act are a suitable basis on which to prosecute piracy offences.

Current capacity, international assistance provided and further international assistance needed for a specialized anti-piracy court

82. On 14 July 2011, Mauritius entered into an agreement with the European Union defining the conditions and modalities for the transfer of suspected pirates and any seized property. No transfers have yet taken place, and no piracy trials have yet been conducted in Mauritius, pending completion of guidelines for the transfer of suspects being developed with the assistance of UNODC. Until the laws and procedures of Mauritius have been tested through transfers of suspects from naval forces, it is difficult to assess with certainty what additional assistance would be required for a specialized anti-piracy court. Nevertheless, UNODC considers that the joint European Union/UNODC programme set out below would provide the necessary capacity.

²⁹ Rather than under transfer arrangements for suspected pirates apprehended at sea by naval forces.

83. UNODC assesses that the Mauritius police is a well-structured, resourced and managed organization. There are a total of 838 Criminal Investigation Division officers, including 320 in the Central Criminal Investigation Division in Port Louis. There are 20 Criminal Investigation Division officers in the anti-piracy unit. They have not yet been engaged in the investigation of piracy cases, apart from one investigator who has been seconded to the Seychelles police for six months to assist with their piracy investigations. Mauritius police investigators have been trained in the investigation of piracy cases, and have attended a number of UNODC regional exchanges to learn how piracy investigations have been carried out in other regional States. Mauritius criminal analysts took part in INTERPOL/UNODC training concerning the analysis of information obtained from convicted pirates.

84. A joint European Union/UNODC programme has been developed to provide support over an 18-month period. It envisages mentoring and training for the police and coastguard, an additional investigator to support piracy investigations, renovation of the police facilities at Port Louis and financial support for transportation, interviewing, custodial and other related costs. Interpretation and mentoring support would also likely be required for piracy investigations.

Prosecutions

85. The Director of Public Prosecutions of Mauritius has not carried out any piracy prosecutions to date, but has agreed to set up a dedicated unit of prosecutors to try piracy cases. UNODC has begun training and mentoring, as well as drafting guidelines for the handover of piracy suspects and evidence by naval States. It has also provided funding for prosecutors to attend meetings of Working Group 2 of the Contact Group on Piracy off the Coast of Somalia, and the shadowing of a United Kingdom prosecutor conducting piracy trials in Seychelles. Further financial support will include covering expenses for the attendance of foreign civilian witnesses at piracy trials and enhanced security arrangements in the Supreme Court.

86. Additional prosecutors would be required to handle the added caseload, but UNODC judges that Mauritius lawyers are trained to a high standard, and there would not be a need to recruit internationally. Two, or sometimes three, prosecutors are assigned to important criminal cases, and UNODC believes that a certain number of prosecutors could be assigned exclusively to handling piracy cases. Mauritius law allows for foreign law firms and lawyers to be registered and to work in Mauritius, and the Chief Justice has the discretion to allow foreign lawyers to take cases before the courts.

87. Piracy cases would be heard before judges of the Supreme Court or before magistrates of the Intermediate Court. The Mauritius courts are well staffed and managed, and UNODC assesses that trials are in accordance with international standards, although there is a significant backlog of cases, mostly civil, but also some criminal. UNODC assesses that Mauritius has perhaps the best developed criminal justice system in the region and would be well placed to deliver substantial prosecuting capability. The Government has stated that a new courtroom is required if piracy trials are to continue beyond the 18 months of the European Union/UNODC joint programme. The Government sees no advantage in establishing a new court with jurisdiction exclusive to piracy, which would constrain court space and court staff to piracy trials.

88. Support would be required for the recruitment of additional judges. UNODC assesses that Mauritius judges are of a high professional standard, and it would not be necessary to recruit internationally. Although participation by foreign judges would be compatible with the law, there is in practice no tradition of accepting foreign judges in the Mauritius courts. The extra caseload would probably necessitate additional court administration staff.

89. The Mauritius prisons are generally overcrowded, but UNODC assesses that they otherwise meet international standards. Accommodation has been identified for up to 30 piracy suspects at Beau Bassin prison. The European Union and UNODC have agreed to fund and/or refurbish part of this prison to standards similar to those for Mauritian prisoners to make some derelict cells suitable for occupation by convicted Somali pirates. Training for 20 senior prison officers has been provided. The joint European Union/UNODC programme would enable improvements to the Beau Bassin prison, drafting work to harmonize the Prison Act, regulations, standing orders and international requirements under which the prisons operate, and further training for prison officers.

90. The Government of Mauritius has indicated a need for additional prison space to allow it to accept further piracy suspects. They have funding for this project, and at this stage are considering where best to locate the new prison facility. The funding may provide for up to 200 prison spaces. The additional prison capacity, along with continued training and management development support for prison officers, are likely to be prerequisites for accepting piracy cases for prosecution. However, given space constraints, and for humanitarian reasons, Mauritius is considering the possibility of negotiating agreements with the Somali authorities for the transfer of convicted pirates.

91. The joint European Union/UNODC programme will support six trials of up to 10 suspects in each trial, over the 18 months of the programme from 1 September 2011. A team of two prosecutors could accept up to 12 cases per annum. A single judge would be able to handle around 12 cases per year. The Chief Justice estimates that, with the new courtroom, two new judges and the necessary support described above, Mauritius could handle 24 cases per year. Once new prison capacity is available, there will be potential for up to 150 piracy suspects to be held. Although the capacity envisaged is 24 cases per year, it should be noted that after about 20 cases, depending on the number of accused per case, the new prison would be full, and prosecutions could only continue on the basis of a functioning prisoner transfer arrangement with Somalia.

92. If Mauritius were willing to take on these piracy prosecutions, it is estimated that a programme of assistance for the police could be developed and implemented in 12 months. Investigative support, including logistics, is likely to cost no more than $200,000 per year. It would take approximately six months to recruit additional prosecutors. Prosecutors in Mauritius are paid approximately $2,000 per month, including benefits. Therefore, two prosecutors for 12 months would cost $48,000. Other logistical assistance, including training and travel, would cost no more than $100,000 per year.

93. It is estimated that a programme of assistance to the courts could be developed and implemented in approximately 12 months. It would take about 12 months to construct a courtroom and recruit the necessary judges and court staff. Judges are paid approximately $60,000 per year, including benefits. Court administration staff are paid approximately $7,200 per year, including benefits. The cost of legal aid for piracy cases in Mauritius is still under negotiation between the defence lawyers and the judiciary, but is likely to be between $6,000 and $10,000 per case. Transcription costs for 24 trials would cost approximately $66,500, and witness travel expenses approximately $116,500. Interpretation costs for 24 trials would be $300,000, allowing for two trials running simultaneously, each with two interpreters.

94. It is estimated that it would take 18 months to complete the new prison facility. The other support required could be provided within six months. Financing for construction of a new prison is already secured. It is estimated that other training and management development support would cost no more than $200,000 per annum. It is not known at this stage whether Mauritius would request assistance with staff and prison running costs.

95. In summary, total annual costs would amount to $1.4 million as follows: police ($200,000); four prosecutors ($96,000); logistical and training support ($100,000); two judges ($120,000); two administrative staff ($14,400); legal aid for 24 cases ($240,000); transcription ($66,400); witness travel ($116,500); interpretation allowing for two trials running simultaneously each with two interpreters ($300,000); prisons ($200,000).³⁰

Transfer of suspects, evidence and prisoners

96. The Government of Mauritius has signed an agreement with the European Union to accept for prosecution persons suspected of committing piracy on the high seas off the territorial seas of Mauritius, Madagascar, the Comoros, Seychelles and Reunion Island. The Government interprets this as being limited to their exclusive economic zones. This agreement therefore does not cover the principal pirate operating areas, and ideally would be expanded to cover a greater geographical area. It is important to note that Mauritius is distant from the areas of the ocean most heavily affected by piracy. Transferring suspects by naval ship may therefore delay their initial appearance in court, and could reduce naval resources in the area of naval operations. Transferring suspects by air via a State closer to the area of naval operations would require an agreement between Mauritius and the transiting

³⁰ These figures assume that Mauritius would cover police and prison staff costs.

State(s), and would require logistical, and possibly financial, support. It would take at least six months to negotiate the necessary agreement(s).

97. UNODC has assisted the Mauritius police to establish guidance for the transfer of evidence, and experience of similar guidance in Kenya and Seychelles suggests that transfers of evidence to Mauritius would be straightforward. Mauritius is considering the possibility of negotiating agreements with the Somali authorities for the transfer of convicted pirates. The Chairman of Working Group 2 of the Contact Group is assisting in this process.

E. United Republic of Tanzania

98. The United Republic of Tanzania has a common law legal system and has two pieces of legislation establishing piracy as a criminal offence: the Penal Code 1945 and the Merchant Shipping Act 2003. The Penal Code was amended in May 2010 to reflect the definition of, and jurisdiction over, piracy set out in article 101 and article 105 of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea, read in conjunction with article 58(2). Section 66 of the Penal Code defines piracy and provides for the inchoate offences of inciting or intentionally facilitating an act of piracy. It sets a maximum penalty of life imprisonment. Sections 22 and 23 of the Penal Code also provide for the offences of enabling or aiding, aiding or abetting, counselling or procuring joint offenders in the prosecution of a common purpose and acts of omission, but not attempt to commit an offence.

99. Section 66 of the Penal Code specifically contemplates the possibility of prosecuting suspected pirates arrested by foreign navies, specifying that a special arrangement between the arresting State or agency and the United Republic of Tanzania is necessary where the pirate ship is not registered in the United Republic of Tanzania.³¹ Any such agreement would need to take into consideration whether the accused persons are suspected of murder, in addition to piracy, as murder carries the death penalty in the United Republic of Tanzania.

100. Section 341 of the Merchant Shipping Act also prohibits piracy. It was amended in May 2010 to criminalize acts of piracy. It also reflects the definition of, and jurisdiction over, piracy offences set out in article 101 and article 105 of the Convention, read in conjunction with article 58(2). Section 341 defines piracy and provides for the offences of inciting or intentionally facilitating an act of piracy. Both the Penal Code and Merchant Shipping Act provide for the offence of inciting or intentionally facilitating acts of piracy. In addition, as mentioned above the Penal Code provides for the offences of enabling or aiding, aiding or abetting, counselling or procuring joint offenders in prosecution of a common purpose and acts of omission, but not attempt to commit an offence. Prosecutions for these offences would be dependent on the law of the extraditing State, as well as that of the United Republic of Tanzania.

³¹ These amendments were made under the Written Laws (Miscellaneous Amendments) (No. 2) Act, 2010, 20 April 2010.

101. Procedure and evidence are dealt with in the Criminal Procedure Act 1985 and the Evidence Act 1967. UNODC considers that the rules of procedure and evidence should be a satisfactory basis on which to conduct piracy prosecutions.

Current capacity, international assistance provided and further international assistance needed for a specialized anti-piracy court

102. The United Republic of Tanzania has not yet conducted any piracy prosecutions. At the moment there are two pending cases, which are at the investigation stage. Until the laws and procedures of the United Republic of Tanzania have been tested through trials of piracy cases, it will be difficult to assess the kind of international assistance that would be required for a specialized anti-piracy court. The Government is actively engaged with the European Union in the negotiation of an agreement for the transfer of suspected pirates for prosecution. In the event of conclusion of that agreement, UNODC will deliver the joint European Union/UNODC programme of assistance set out below, and considers that this would provide the necessary capacity for a specialized anti-piracy court.

103. Tanzanian police officers have taken part in counter-piracy training, including UNODC training in Mombasa, the INTERPOL/UNODC training programme for the analysis of information received from convicted pirates, and counter-piracy training organized by the United States in Mombasa, Kenya.

104. A joint European Union/UNODC programme of assistance to the United Republic of Tanzania with both short-term (up to 18 months) and medium-term (18 months to three years) elements has been proposed and the Government is considering it. It will be implemented if and when an agreement is concluded between the United Republic of Tanzania and the European Union for the transfer of piracy suspects. The short-term programme envisages a package of training and mentoring for the police and coastguard in investigative techniques, evidence handling and the conduct of complex investigations. UNODC would also refurbish the central police station and detention cells, enhance the police forensic scenes of crime unit facility and provide essential investigative equipment.

Prosecution

105. There are 305 prosecutors in the United Republic of Tanzania, including 32 senior attorneys, who have been organized in five specialized units. At the moment, the unit that would be responsible for prosecuting piracy cases has 10 senior attorneys. Tanzanian prosecutors have attended a number of UNODC training courses and are familiar with the experiences of other regional States engaged in piracy prosecutions. The short-term European Union/UNODC programme envisages a package of training and mentoring for prosecutors, participation in conferences and meetings of Working Group 2 of the Contact Group on Piracy off the Coast of Somalia, support for the drafting of evidence handover guidance, and provision of library and other essential resources.

Courts, including legal aid and defence representation

106. The Tanzanian High Court comprises 61 judges in 13 locations. Dar es Salaam and Tanga would be the most appropriate locations for hearing piracy cases, given their port facilities and high security prisons. UNODC assesses that, although the judges are of a high professional standard, they would be likely to benefit from training in law of the sea, and piracy trials specifically. The High Court has a large backlog of cases, which could take two to five years to complete. The judiciary is trying to streamline procedures to reduce these delays. The Registry in Dar es Salaam has begun reviewing and reforming the case management systems, including with the assistance of an internationally recruited legal adviser. A few Tanzanian judges have attended UNODC regional exchanges and are familiar with the issues associated with piracy trials.

107. The short-term European Union/UNODC programme envisages training and mentoring support to the judiciary, specialized training in the law of the sea and cross-border investigations, attendance at conferences and courses, support for the cost of travel for foreign witnesses to testify in piracy trials, provision of legal representation for suspects at trials, provision of interpretation and transcription services for piracy trials, improvement of the High Court facilities and infrastructure, including the prisoner holding capacity and storage area for exhibits, provision of secure docks in the Supreme Court, and procurement of additional court security services, essential legal resources and materials, as well as video link technology.

108. The United Republic of Tanzania has 38,000 prisoners in a system designed for fewer than 30,000. The prison service has identified a 72-space discrete unit at the Ukonga Prison in Dar es Salaam which could be remodelled for use as accommodation for Somali piracy suspects. UNODC anticipates that, for the United Republic of Tanzania to be prepared to play a role in piracy prosecutions, they would either seek assistance to create additional prison spaces or assistance to reduce their current prisoner population, or both. Two Tanzanian senior prison officers have attended UNODC regional learning exchanges and are familiar with the issues associated with the custody of Somali piracy suspects.

109. Based on the assumption that Ukonga Prison would be used, the short-term European Union/UNODC programme envisages refurbishment and rehabilitation of prison cells, training of prison staff, provision of essential equipment, including medical supplies and recreational resources, provision of material for prisoner clothing, purchase of plates, cups, serving utensils, bedding, blankets and mattresses, provision of vehicles for prison management and transport of inmates from prison to court and provision of radio communications equipment and humane restraints.

110. The joint European Union/UNODC programme would provide capacity to hear five piracy cases per year. The international assistance set out in the short-term joint European Union/UNODC programme would be delivered over an 18-month period, and the long-term programme over three years. The estimated total cost is approximately $2 million. The commencement of the programme will be dependent on consideration by the United Republic of Tanzania of the programme proposal and a decision whether to enter into a transfer agreement with the European Union.

Transfers of suspects, evidence and those convicted

111. The United Republic of Tanzania has no existing arrangements to receive piracy suspects and evidence from naval States, nor does it have prisoner transfer arrangements with Somalia. However, arrangements to receive suspects and evidence could be put in place without difficulty or delay. The Government is engaged in negotiation of a transfer agreement with the European Union and is considering the joint European Union/UNODC proposal.

IV. Detailed implementation proposals

112. The first step before planning the caseload capacities of specialized anti-piracy courts in the region and a regional prosecution centre would be to assess, with the assistance of the naval coalitions and other naval States active in the repression of piracy off the coast of Somalia, the anticipated number of piracy suspects that are likely to be transferred to States in the region. Projects to increase the capacities of regional jurisdictions should be matched to the anticipated workload. A second important preliminary step is to ensure that work is funded and under way to increase prison capacity, primarily in “Puntland” and “Somaliland”, but also in the regional States. Otherwise, the lack of sufficient prison space for piracy suspects on remand and convicted pirates may restrict the caseload capacity of the specialized anti-piracy courts that are the subject of this report.

113. Subject to the above considerations, the suggested detailed implementation proposals for the specialized anti-piracy courts are set out below in two sections — measures of a general nature, and a country-by-country list of specific implementation steps.

A. Measures of a general nature

114. Measures of a more general nature to be considered by the Security Council, UNDP, UNODC and other relevant international organizations, as appropriate, would include the following:

- (a) The Security Council would encourage those regional States which have yet to enter into agreements with naval States and organizations for the transfer of piracy suspects to do so as a matter of priority;
- (b) The Security Council would call upon States where the financiers, planners and organizers of piracy off the coast of Somalia are believed to be (see S/2011/360, annex IV) to investigate, prosecute or extradite such individuals to States willing and able to conduct prosecutions;
- (c) The Security Council would call upon the relevant Somali authorities, “Puntland” and “Somaliland” to consider the urgent adoption of the legislation necessary for the effective prosecution of those suspected of piracy, consistent with the provisions of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea;
- (d) The Security Council would urge the relevant Somali authorities, “Puntland” and “Somaliland” to ensure that arrangements for the transfer of those convicted in other jurisdictions to Somalia for imprisonment become operationally effective at the earliest opportunity;

(e) The Security Council would encourage further donations to the Trust Fund to Support Initiatives of States Countering Piracy off the Coast of Somalia, including from the shipping industry and flag States, so that the proposed assistance by UNDP and UNODC to regional States referred to in this report can go ahead as planned;

(f) UNDP and UNODC would discuss and obtain the agreement (to the extent not already obtained) of the relevant authorities for projects engaging their police, marine police, prosecution services and courts to increase trial capacity to 24 trials per year each in “Puntland”, “Somaliland” (UNDP), Seychelles, Kenya and Mauritius, and five cases per year in the United Republic of Tanzania (UNODC);

(g) UNODC would discuss and obtain the agreement (to the extent not already obtained) of the relevant authorities for projects to increase prison capacities, most urgently in “Puntland” and “Somaliland”, but also in Seychelles, Kenya, the United Republic of Tanzania and Mauritius;

(h) UNDP and UNODC would assist with recruitment of the necessary judges, prosecutors, police and other legal professionals, and recruit the necessary international experts, as set out in the present report;

(i) In recruiting international experts to participate, assist and mentor in “Puntland” and “Somaliland”, UNDP would actively consider the use of legal professionals and experts from the Somali diaspora, and to that end, contact the Somali Law Council and the Council of Somali Organizations³² for names and contact details of willing and available individuals;

(j) UNDP and UNODC, in their projects with regional States, would look actively at the possibility of including capacity-building for the investigation and prosecution of those suspected of crimes of financing, planning or organizing acts of piracy;

(k) UNDP and UNODC would continue to develop guidance on the procedural and evidentiary requirements of “Puntland”, “Somaliland” (UNDP) and the regional States engaged in, or considering playing a role in, piracy prosecutions (UNODC);

(l) UNODC, in cooperation with the Chairman of Working Group 2 of the Contact Group on Piracy off the Coast of Somalia, would assist the authorities of Somalia, “Puntland” and “Somaliland”, to negotiate prisoner transfer arrangements with States in the region engaged in the prosecution of piracy suspects, or considering doing so.

B. Specific measures

V. Conclusions

124. Consultations demonstrate that a great deal of work is under way to assist the regional States conducting piracy prosecutions and those considering doing so. If further international assistance were provided and the other matters set out in the present report are implemented, the projection is that in two years, Somalia, Kenya, Seychelles, Mauritius and the United Republic of Tanzania collectively could conduct a maximum of 125 piracy prosecutions per year in accordance with international standards, involving up to 1,250 suspects. This would be a very significant contribution to combating piracy off the coast of Somalia, and would be greater than the total number of suspects prosecuted globally to date (see the table in paragraph 10 above).

125. As a first step, an assessment, with the assistance of the naval coalitions and other States active in naval operations, could be useful to help to determine the number of piracy incidents in which the suspects have been apprehended but released, and the reasons underlying the releases. This information may assist both the Security Council and the Contact Group in their consideration of the most effective measures to combat piracy off the coast of Somalia, and assist regional States and the United Nations to determine the likely demand for prosecution capacity in the region for the foreseeable future.

126. On that basis, a number of implementation measures may be taken by the Security Council, UNDP, UNODC, and other relevant international organizations as appropriate, for specialized anti-piracy courts in States in the region. The availability of sufficient and suitable imprisonment facilities, including in Somalia, remains a key requirement. The scope for participation and/or assistance by international judges, prosecutors and other legal professionals, including those from the relevant diaspora populations, will be actively considered in each of these specialized anti-piracy courts.

127. The establishment of a regional prosecution centre in Seychelles would further a number of the goals identified by the Special Adviser to the Secretary-General. In particular, it would act as a focal point for regional and international support to the prosecution of piracy suspects and help to strengthen the rule of law in Somalia. The centre would enjoy relative advantages in respect of cost and speed of establishment, as it would be based in the national legal system and would provide a location offering relative logistical ease for the transfer of suspects by naval forces.

128. The Secretary-General stands ready to assist the Security Council in any way as it takes forward its deliberations on the basis of the present report.
